Organic gardening can improve one's life in many ways. Many believe commercially grown crops have robbed the soil of its nutrients because of overusing the land without rotating crops or only using chemically altered fertilizers that have been manufactured commercially. There is a growing concern that the fruits and vegetables have been exposed to many chemical pesticides.

These practices have harmed fresh water supplies. The chemicals run off into the watershed have traveled through soil that has lost some of its natural filtering abilities because of too much soil erosion clogging the system therefore altering the structure of the soil. The added chemicals will travel through the air due to evaporation. The water that forms in the clouds will fall as rain elsewhere and it will still have some of the chemicals.

The gardener, who chooses organic gardening may start out just wanting to provide healthier foods for the family, will soon discover how this type of gardening is helping out the environment.

This report is an excellent place to start for an overview of organic gardening practices and how they can be fit into the lifestyles of average people whether they have 1000 acres, or a simple window herb garden.
